DIVISION OF PRESERVATION AND ACCESS •

Through the Division of Preservation and Access, NEH supports projects that preserve, create, and make available cultural resources that enrich research, education, and public programming in the humanities. The Endowment also awards grants for education programs in preservation and for research and development projects. NEH funding helps establish an infrastructure for preservation work and access to collections in our nation's libraries, museums, archives, and historical organizations. In fiscal year 2004, NEH grants supported preservation and access activities in 208 institutions in forty-two states and the District of Columbia.

Awards made in 2004 help preserve, stabilize, and provide intellectual access to important collections pertaining to American social, cultural, and political history.

These collections include major holdings of recorded sound, film, textiles, photographs, historical and archaeological artifacts, rare books, correspondence, manuscripts, and other documents. Funding in 2004 supported educational programs as well as the work of regional preservation field services. This support will enable staff members at hundreds of libraries, museums, and archives in the United States to acquire the necessary training to preserve their cultural collections.

Among the grants awarded by the Division of Preservation and Access in 2004, one went to the American Antiquarian Society for the creation of a database of American electoral returns from 1788 to 1825, featuring information on presidential, congressional, gubernatorial, and state executive and legislative elections. An award to the National Preservation Program for Agricultural Literature at Cornell University helped to microfilm thousands of deteriorating volumes of agricultural reports from Colorado, Maryland, Oklahoma, and Washington State. With NEH support, the Southeastern Library Network in Atlanta supports workshops, publications, and other educational programs for hundreds of public, college, and university libraries and archives in ten southeastern states. The Library Company of Philadelphia received a grant to catalog and preserve fifty thousand broadsides, song sheets, playbills, and other materials produced during the Civil War era. Another grant enabled the University of Texas at Austin to purchase storage furniture to house paintings and materials from the performing arts and television collections at the Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center. Finally, in 2004, the NEH made 149 preservation assistance grants to small and mid-sized libraries, museums, and archives, such as the Beaufort Historical Association in North Carolina, which purchased equipment to monitor the environmental conditions of the buildings housing its collection of nineteenth-century medical instruments and books, and its antique dolls, toys, and furniture collections.

Fifty states, two U.S. territories, and the District of Columbia are involved in the Endowment's United States Newspaper Program, an initiative that catalogs and preserves on microfilm newspapers of the past three hundred years. Awards in 2004 went to microfilm historic newspapers in Illinois, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and New York. More than 281,841 historic newspaper titles will be accessible, state-by-state, on a national database, and approximately sixty-nine million deteriorating newspaper pages will be saved. With the advent of digital technology, there is now a means of providing full text searching of newspaper content. As part of the Endowment's We the People initiative, a major effort will be made to digitize microfilmed pages of historically significant newspapers, which could be searched on a free national database via the Internet. In pursuit of this objective, NEH and the Library of Congress signed a memorandum of understanding on March 31, 2004, establishing a partnership to create the National Digital Newspaper Program. During the next twenty years the Endowment will provide grants to digitize titles published between 1836 and 1922 and to prepare fully searchable files that the Library of Congress will maintain on its Web site.
